Vučić: Presidential Election by February at the Latest

Serbian President Aleksandar Vučić announced that the presidential election would be held by early February at the latest, depending on the timing of the parliamentary election, which could take place in October or November. Vučić expressed optimism that the sale of the Russian stake in the Petroleum Industry of Serbia would soon be completed and praised the removal of US tariffs on Serbia, stating that the country had met four key criteria. He stressed that negotiations with the United States would be difficult and complex.

Praise for Macut; Debate; Then Dismissal

A session of the National Assembly of Serbia has been scheduled for July 27 to debate a no-confidence motion against the government of Đuro Macut, a prime minister whom the opposition describes as a nominal leader whose government has failed to achieve significant results in combating corruption, advancing European integration, ensuring media freedom, improving education and healthcare, or raising living standards. Government representatives maintain that the government has been successful and that the debate will strengthen democracy, while the opposition expects a serious discussion of the current political situation ahead of an early parliamentary election.

Serbia on Its Path to the EU; Vučić on European Integration; Foreign Direct Investment in Serbia

Serbia is on the European path, and the European Union is where I want to see the country, President Aleksandar Vučić said in an interview with Austria's Die Presse. Serbia accounts for 57.1% of the Western Balkans' total exports to the European Union and attracts more than 60% of foreign direct investment. Serbia's gross domestic product represents more than half of the GDP of the entire Western Balkans.
