Recognition of Kosovo as Fuel for the Road to the EU

The article examines the political conditions for Serbia to continue its European integration, with particular attention to the issue of Kosovo. It focuses on expectations that candidate countries align their foreign-policy positions with the European Union, as well as the possible link between progress in accession and relations between Belgrade and Pristina. The issue is considered within the broader debate on the future enlargement of the EU and the political requirements imposed on candidate countries.

EU Wants New Members, but Not Ones Like Orban

The European Commission is considering additional safeguards for future EU member states to prevent the blocking of joint decisions and violations of democratic standards. Proposals include the possibility of withholding funds or voting rights, as well as a longer monitoring period after accession. Eleven countries, including France and Germany, have also called for consideration of limiting the veto in foreign policy, but there is no full agreement among member states.

Kurti Curtailed the Jurisdiction of the Court for KLA War Crimes

The Assembly of the provisional institutions in Pristina adopted amendments narrowing the jurisdiction of the Specialist Chambers for KLA crimes, prompting concern from the European Union. According to the article, the decision resulted from a political agreement between Self-Determination and the Democratic Party of Kosovo connected with the election of the president. Brussels said that Pristina must respect its international obligations, the independence of the court, and the victims' right to justice.

Beckerath: Institutions Should Guarantee Journalists a Safe and Professional Working Environment

Andreas von Beckerath, Head of the Delegation of the European Union to Serbia, pointed to the responsibility of state institutions to provide journalists with a safe environment for professional work. The message focuses on protecting media workers, ensuring conditions for unhindered reporting, and the importance of an institutional response when journalists are threatened. Media freedom and safety are also viewed in the context of European standards Serbia is expected to meet.
