Serbian Government Extends Fuel Excise Tax Reduction

Serbia's caretaker government extended the measure reducing excise duties on petroleum products by 25 percent. The decision is intended to ease pressure from fuel prices on citizens and the economy, while market price movements continue to be monitored. This type of state intervention directly affects retail fuel prices and transportation costs. Further effects will depend on oil price movements and the duration of the measure.

Citizens Face a 30 Billion Dinar Bill

Danas analyzes the financial condition of Belgrade's public utility companies and the costs being passed on to citizens. The article states that almost all city utility companies are operating at a loss and have significant debts to suppliers, raising questions about the sustainability of the system. It also raises the issue of how current operations and future investment in utility infrastructure will be financed. The financial problems of public companies may affect the quality and price of services.

Complete Ban on Bisphenol in Food Packaging

The European Union is introducing a ban on bisphenol A and related substances in materials that come into contact with food. The measure covers both single-use and reusable packaging, while transitional periods until 2028 are provided for certain types of cans. The ban is based on assessments of the health risks these substances pose to consumers. Packaging manufacturers and the food industry will have to gradually adapt their materials and production processes.

Brazilian Honey and Chicken Can Enter the EU

European Union auditors have issued a positive assessment representing an important step toward restoring access for Brazilian honey and chicken meat to the EU market. The issue is significant for international food trade and the conditions for access to the European market. A positive assessment by the auditors does not necessarily mean that all trade procedures have already been completed. Further steps depend on meeting veterinary and other standards for food exports to the EU.

Homemakers Choose Between Store-Bought and Homemade Ajvar

Ahead of winter-preserve preparation, households are comparing the costs of homemade and store-bought ajvar. The article considers the prices of peppers and other ingredients, as well as the amount of labor required for preparation, which affects consumers' decisions. The final calculation is influenced by pepper yield, energy consumption, and the cost of additional ingredients. In addition to the financial aspect, quality, taste, and the time households can devote to preparation are also important.
